The programme commenced with the welcome address and introduction about the resource person Mr.Simon Raj, Department of Child Protection Rights, Collectorate, Salem-8

The Resource person emphasized the following points to make student-teachers aware of the child protection.

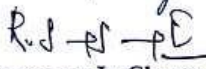

Highlights:

- The Protection of Children from Sexual Offences (POCSO) Act was passed by the Indian government in 2012 to make India's position on child protection even clearer than previously.
- It is a specific law that imposes severe penalties on anyone who sexually abuses or assaults a child and treats everyone under the age of 18 as a child.
- According to the POCSO Act, aggravated sexual assault and aggravated penetrative sexual assault are both criminal offences, as is any type of sexual abuse or assault involving children, including the use or storage of pornographic material involving children.

SRI SARADA COLLEGE OF EDUCATION (AUTONOMOUS), SALEM -16

- Three years in prison is the maximum possible sentence. The law's significant clause holds that failing to notify a case is punishable. This is punishable by a six-month prison sentence, a fine, or both.
- The POCSO Act's gender neutrality, which acknowledges that boys can also be sexual assault victims, is another distinguishing aspect. From reporting and documenting evidence to investigating and trying offenders, POCSO Act has made an effort to make it child-friendly in every way.
- The Government of India has made a tonne of materials available to the general public in order to ensure that the POCSO Act is implemented effectively.

Evidence of success: This opened the door for a discussion on preventative measures, advice, and possible warning signs of child abuse that student-teachers should be aware of.
